DISSERTATION

Title: The Politics of the Extinction Predicament – Democracy, Futurity, and Responsibility
Committee: Christine Di Stefano (Chair), Karen Litfin, Jamie Mayerfeld, Steve Herbert

My dissertation demonstrates how the “extinction predicament” – the inseparable connection between species loss and issues of social justice and development – benefits from the critical resources of environmental political theory. Species loss is a quiet and cumulative crisis that will sharply increase in the coming decades unless biodiversity conservation is deeply democratized by a politics of futurity that expands our ethical imagination and increases the scope of responsibility to future generations of human and nonhuman life. Beginning with the premise that issues in biodiversity conservation are best framed as a democratic project, I investigate the challenges and opportunities of linking environmental justice, social equity, and democratic governance in a world with vast differences in wealth and power, and where novel connections between the global and the local are increasingly relevant. Combining readings of Jonas on responsibility to preserve ecological legacies, Arendt on care for the earth, and contemporary environmental political theorists such as Douglass Torgerson, Robyn Eckersley, and Steven M. Meyer, I engage arguments that emphasize accountability to future generations, deliberative and participatory democracy, and creative forms of individual and social agency. The politics of the extinction predicament should reflect unique local conditions and contribute to cross-cultural dialogue, particularly regarding the meaning and status of wildness and human relationships to wildness, place, and otherness. In doing so, green politics should mirror the diversity it seeks to preserve.
